The swallow said: "My wings are strong.

I came from sun-warm palace walls
Across blue seas. The way is long
And I have stopped and heard men

By mayside shrines and in great halls, In house and hovel by the way, But I have not heard anywhere A prayer that was like this man'n prayer." The sparrow said: "No sparrow falls Without God's pity! Does he know—This man who prays—on whom he cails!"

The King of Prussia stood below In the Cathedral nave and said: "Now let their harvests be their dead, Let gas and shell go tear and kill. Until the world bends to my will:"

The birds on the Cathedral spires
Waited to see the prayer go by.
(The little birds can see your prayers.
White-winged ascending to the sky!)
Pale lilles on the marble grew.
Carved saints were on the walls, and through
The flower windows shone the sun.
The sparrow said: "His prayer is done."
The wallow wold: "Where dis its prayer. FRONT-ONLY A FEW FEET FROM FRANKLIN SQUARE-CONTAINING done."

The swaljow said: "Where did it go? It is a strange prayer, flying low! They rose and searched the larkspur sky.

They asked the clouds that drifted by. But the prayer had no wings and stayed. In the dark heart where it was made—Louise Driscoll, in the New York Times.

ON LEAVE. When I was young they used to tell
Of places known as Heaven and Hell.
Heaven was full of angels wings,
And singing saints and suchlike things.
It was prepared I heard them say.
For those who loved the Narrow Way.
That is—who thought the same as they.
But there were fires unearthly hot
For folks whose faith they fancied not.
I said, "Such things can never be!
How could all Heaven smile with glee
While Hell was full of agony?"
But see! I did not argue well,
For here I come to Heaven from Hell.
And wonder how one world can hold.
Such boundless bliss, such pain untold.
—S. J. Schofield, in the Westminster
Gazette.
